From the earliest civilizations, beginning with drum beats and other primitive instruments, music has played an integral part in societies. Humans thrive on non-verbal communication, and rhythm, melody, and harmony fill that need like no other medium. The basic stages of music-making with the voice, humming and intoning, are natural responses in children. This tendency is carried throughout adult life, performing with the voice, playing various instruments, and listening to music. Nothing brings people of the world together better than music. Even when one does not understand another's language, music can establish a strong connection.

As in all metaphysical areas, attempts to offer proof of aesthetic significance almost always falls short, yet that becomes its fascination. There is a mysterious connection between music and the human spirit that constantly intrigues. This is true with many spiritual aspects of life, and one ends engaging in the activity and enjoying the process rather than attempting to offer empirical evidence. The best that can be expressed is the high degree of inspiration and enjoyment music can bring to the human spirit. Music speaks to and connects with the soul like no other medium, and constantly makes life more interesting and fulfilling. Those enrichments speak for themselves and personally provide ultimate answers.
